Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a device for filtering and conditioning air and, in particular, to such a device which reduces the level of carbon dioxide and particles (dirt, dust and the like) in air flow. 2. Description of the Related Art In the past, it has been the general practice to ventilate the inside of warehouses, in particular, to supply proper air to the inside of warehouses for maintaining temperature and humidity thereof or to ventilate the inside of warehouses to recover the air therein. Furthermore, it has been customary to ventilate the inside of warehouses to improve the quality of the air in the warehouse and to reduce the concentrations of carbon dioxide and dust in the air in the warehouse. For these purposes, conventionally, filter media made of activated carbon or the like has been disposed to adsorb or absorb the dust in the air in a warehouse, carbonic acid gas, organic gas and the like contained in the air, and/or organic matter, bacteria and the like present in the air. An attempt has been made to add a biological culture to the filter to produce oxygen from carbon dioxide which has been adsorbed in the activated carbon or the like thereby improving the quality of the air in the warehouse. However, the addition of the biological culture to the filter media is accompanied by such a disadvantage that activated carbon, whose availability is relatively short, is used as the filter media. Furthermore, another problem is that inasmuch as the biological culture is a living organism, the biological culture attached to the filter media cannot but be wasted after it has served its purpose, leaving the activated carbon as the main component of the filter media. Furthermore, the filter media can not but be used only for a short period of time because of the loss of carbon dioxide when it is used in an oxidizing condition, resulting in the activated carbon showing the same defect of short term availability as in the first instance.Retroactive Emulation Update for LEGO MINDSTORMS EV3 The Retroactive Emulation Update for LEGO MINDSTORMS EV3 now d0c515b9f4
